Empty definition) And you are inheriting from the theme. Holt, you always get the appearance of the check box corresponding to the theme. Since we previously established that this is the button selector that determines the appearance of the check box, we can set it as "Drawable button" on the widget. The result is a check box with the appearance of the `Holo.light` version, regardless of which theme / style set to the application, activity or widget in XML. Update2: With the introduction of the support library V22.1.0, things have just been improved! A quote of the release notes (my emphasis): Lollipop added the possibility of overwriting the theme in view level view using the Android attribute: XML theme - incredibly useful for things like dark action bars on the activities of light. So let's look at the parent style. (...) There is anyway to use this selector: Link? However, a way to access system resources after all is performing a search ID by name. Then this where the true magic takes place: based on the `ListoOceIndicalamultiple` attribute of the theme, the actual appearance of the check box is determined. Ie. In the context of the original question, compare the results:
